Competition Guideline 4: Vertical Arrangements

What this guideline is about

This guideline is one in a series of publications designed to inform businesses and consumers about how we, the Jersey Competition Regulatory Authority (the Authority), applies competition law in Jersey.

The purpose of this guideline is to explain to consumers, businesses and their advisers the provisions in the Jersey competition law in respect of vertical arrangements, such as exclusive purchasing agreements, exclusive distribution agreements and franchise agreements. Specifically, this Guideline has been prepared to explain Part 2 of the Competition (Jersey) Law 2005 (the Competition Law).

Article 7 of the Competition Law provides that the Authority may publish guidelines on any aspect of that Law. Proof that a person has failed to comply with a guideline is not proof that the person has failed to comply with a requirement of the Competition Law. However, in proceedings where it is alleged that a person has failed to comply with a requirement of the Law:

- (a) Proof of a failure to comply with a guideline published by the Authority in respect of the requirement may be relied upon as tending to establish non-compliance with the requirement; and
- (b) Proof of compliance with the guideline may be relied upon as tending to establish compliance with the requirement.

This guideline should not be relied on as a substitute for the Law itself. If you have any doubts about your position under the Law, you should seek legal advice.

1. Introduction

Open and vigorous competition is good for consumers because it can result in lower prices, new products of a better quality and more choice. It is also good for fair-dealing businesses, which flourish when markets are competitive.

In Jersey, the Competition Law prohibits anticompetitive behaviour, including anticompetitive agreements between businesses and the abuse of a dominant position in a market. They also require certain mergers and acquisitions to be notified to the Authority for approval.

What powers does the JCRA have?

The Authority has a wide range of powers to investigate businesses suspected of breaching the law. It can order that offending agreements or conduct be stopped and levy financial penalties on businesses and individuals for the breach.

What types of organisation are considered a 'business'?

Throughout this guide, we refer to a 'business'. This term (also referred to as an 'undertaking' in the respective laws) means any entity engaged in economic activity, irrespective of its legal status, including companies, partners, cooperatives, States' departments and individuals operating as sole traders.

A Note on European Union (EU) Competition Law

The competition law in Jersey is modelled on the competition provisions in the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU. Jersey legislation places certain obligations on the Authority and the Royal Court when applying the competition laws. Article 60 of the Competition Law provides that so far as possible questions arising in relation to competition must be dealt with in a manner that is consistent with the treatment of corresponding questions arising under EU competition law.

As noted above, the Authority must endeavour to ensure that, as far as possible, competition matters arising in Jersey are dealt with in a manner consistent with – or, at least, that takes account of – the treatment of corresponding questions under EU competition law. Relevant sources include judgments of the European Court of Justice or General Court, decisions taken and guidance published by the European Commission, and interpretations of EU competition law by courts and competition authorities in the EU Member States. Article 60, however, does not prevent the Authority from departing from EU precedents where this is appropriate in light of the particular circumstances of Jersey.

2. Vertical Agreements

Common forms of vertical agreements include:

- exclusive purchase agreements;
- exclusive distribution agreements;
- exclusive customer allocation agreements;
- selective distribution agreements;
- franchise agreements; and
- exclusive supply agreements.¹

Distribution agreements between manufacturers and wholesalers or retailers are typical examples of vertical agreements. Sales to final customers who do not themselves have market power, and which solely determine the price and quantity of the goods or services provided, generally do not restrict competition and usually fall outside the anti-competitive agreement provisions in the laws.

Therefore in the following diagram:

Transactions A and B generally would be potentially subject to the Law and covered by the material in this guideline. Transactions C and D i.e., the final sales to consumers, either by a retailer or direct from a manufacturer, are generally very unlikely to restrict competition in a market, although they may be subject to the laws' application in other circumstances².

It is important to note at the outset that just because an agreement may be subject to the laws does not mean that it necessarily infringes the Law. The law only apply to vertical agreements that have the object or effect of preventing or hindering competition in Jersey. Furthermore, in some cases, vertical agreements that may be subject to the prohibitions in the laws may still qualify for an exemption.

¹ See the Appendix for a brief explanation of each of these types of agreements.

² If, for example, the retailer was a dominant firm and sold the good or service at excessive prices. See generally Guideline XX - Abuse of a Dominant Position

3. Basic Parameters

The same basic parameters that govern the applicability of competition law to horizontal agreements also apply to vertical agreements. For more information, see Guideline XX - Anti-Competitive Agreements, which explains these parameters in detail.

Particular features in the context of vertical agreements are set out below.

i) Agreement

There must be an arrangement, agreement or understanding, a decision of an association of businesses, or a concerted practice involving businesses³. There does not need to be a formal, written agreement, so long as the businesses in question have a "meeting of the minds" as to the actions that each will, or will not, take.

ii) At Least Two Businesses

There must be an agreement between two or more businesses. The laws do not apply to agreements between two parts of the same business, i.e. the same economic unit. Thus, in a vertical context, parties to certain forms of agency agreements are not considered to be distinct businesses, meaning that the laws are not applicable to their activities under the agreement in question. This factor is dealt with in more detail below.

iii) Hindering or preventing competition

The vertical agreement in question must have the object or effect of hindering or preventing competition. This factor is dealt with in more detail in section 5 below.

iv) In Jersey

The hindering or prevention of competition must occur in Jersey to be subject to the competition law provisions. This means, as a practical matter, that an agreement entered into in a third country, for example, the UK or France can still be subject to the laws if it has effects in Jersey markets.

4. Agency Agreements and Distribution Agreements

As noted above, genuine agency agreements are considered to fall outside the scope of the prohibition on anti-competitive agreements where the agent can be regarded in effect as part of the same business as the principal.

Whether a particular agent forms part of the same business as the principal depends on the level of financial or commercial risk the agent assumes in relation to the activities conducted for the principal.

³ Article 8 of the Competition (Jersey) Law 2005 prohibits "arrangements" which have the "object or effect of hindering to an appreciable extent" competition. Article 1 of the Law then defines "arrangement" as meaning "any type of arrangement, agreement or understanding"

Under competition law as defined in the EU, there are two types of risk:

- risks directly related to the contracts concluded by the agent on the principal's behalf (such as financing inventory or stocks); and
- risks related to investments (investments specifically required for the type of activity for which the agent has been appointed by the principal), which often are irrecoverable or sunk costs.

If the agent bears neither, or an insignificant amount of, these risks in relation to an activity it conducts on behalf of the principal, then the agent will be regarded as part of the same business as the principal, as opposed to a separate business, and hence the agreement between them will fall outside the scope of the laws. The financial risks arising from solely being an agent, for example, an agent's income being dependent on its ability to effectively perform on the principal's behalf, are not relevant in this context.

In addition to the assumption of risk, there are practical indications that often are used to characterise a particular agreement:

If so, then the agreement in question is likely not to
be an agency agreement
If so, then the agreement in question is likely not to be an agency agreement. This does not prevent an agent from arranging transport of goods to the Channel Islands, so long as these costs are ultimately paid by the principal.
If so, then the agreement in question is likely to be an agency agreement.
If so, then the agreement in question is likely not to be an agency agreement.
be an agency agreement.
If so, then the agreement in question is likely not to be an agency agreement.

Finally, although individual agency agreements are excluded from the applicability of the laws, concerns could be raised if multiple principals that otherwise compete against each other all use the same agent in Jersey. This could be seen as leading to concerted action among the principals (arising from information exchanged via the common agent), which could raise independent concerns under the laws.

5. Hindering or Preventing Competition

Assuming the basic parameters discussed above are satisfied, a vertical agreement will only be subject to the law if it has the object or effect of hindering or preventing competition in the supply of goods or services within Jersey⁴.

The laws requires the Authority to act 'as consistently as possible' (Jersey) with the treatment of corresponding questions that have arisen under competition law in the European Union – see section 1 above. Our analysis of vertical agreements will therefore be informed by precedents established by the European Commission and European courts, as well as guidance provided by EU Member States such as the UK. To this end, we will have regard to authorities such as the European Commission's Guidelines on Vertical Restraints⁵ and the Guideline on Vertical Agreements published by the UK Office of Fair Trading. Recourse to such materials, however, only informs our analysis, and does not prevent us from departing from EU precedents if we find that circumstances specific to markets in Jersey warrants such a departure.

Based on sources such as those listed above, set out below are some guiding factors that indicate when a vertical agreement may be seen as having the object or effect of hindering or preventing competition.

Resale Price Maintenance or Vertical Price Fixing

The general prohibition on price fixing agreements under the competition law applies equally in a vertical context, meaning that a manufacturer cannot set a re-seller's prices or enforce its adherence to minimum prices⁶. 'Prices' in this sense would include setting a re-seller's margin; setting the maximum discounts that a re-seller may apply; making payments from a manufacturer (such as rebates) conditional on a re-seller maintaining minimum prices; or the use of intimidation, threats, etc. to pressure a re-seller to maintain a minimum price.

We are likely to conclude that vertical agreements containing any such restrictions have the object of hindering or preventing competition. Furthermore, the inclusion of such restrictions may result in the agreement in question not being capable of satisfying the criteria for an exemption.

Recommended retail prices or the imposition of Maximum Resale Prices

⁴ Article 8 of the Competition (Jersey) Law 2005 prohibits arrangements which have the "object or effect of hindering to an appreciable extent" competition. Article 1 of the Law then defines "hinder" as meaning "prevent, restrict or distort".

⁵ O.J. C 130/1, 19 May 2010

⁶ Throughout these bullet points, the terms 'manufacturer' and 're-seller' are used. The use of these terms is for ease of reference, and the principles discussed herein apply equally to other vertical relationships.

In contrast to vertical price fixing or establishing minimum resale prices, a manufacturer's recommendation of a resale price to a re-seller, or establishing a maximum resale price that a re-seller cannot exceed, are practices that are generally not seen as having the object of hindering or preventing competition. Such practices must be viewed in the context of their effects in the market before determining whether they are anticompetitive. The distinction between a manufacturer merely recommending a resale price and enforcing a re-seller's adherence to such a price, however, can be fine, and will often depend on the level of economic pressure the manufacturer can impose on the reseller.

Exclusive agreements are always more potentially problematic than non-exclusive ones

As a general rule, exclusive agreements in a vertical context, such as exclusive purchase or distribution agreements, raise more serious concerns than non-exclusive agreements⁷. This is because effective competition may be compromised if suppliers are 'tied' to certain re-sellers through exclusive obligations, or if re-sellers agree to sell only one manufacturer's product. This general rule does not mean that exclusive agreements will always be anti-competitive or that they may not otherwise qualify for an exemption. Exclusive distribution agreements can be important to ensure the supply of goods or services into the market, or to prevent one re-seller from 'free-riding' off the investments made by another re-seller, and the laws permit us to take such matters into account when analysing a specific agreement. Furthermore, just because an agreement is nonexclusive in form does not mean that it automatically falls outside of the restrictions in the law when in fact it has an exclusive effect in Jersey⁸.

The longer the duration of an exclusive agreement, the potentially more problematic, and vice-versa

Exclusive supply obligations generally are viewed as more restrictive for dominant suppliers than non-dominant suppliers

The effect on competition arising from the duration of an exclusive supply agreement may be affected by the market power of the supplier. For suppliers holding a position of dominance in a given market, even a modestly tied market share, or exclusive contracts of limited duration, may hinder or prevent competition. On the other hand, exclusive agreements entered into by suppliers with a market share of 30% or less usually will not be seen as hindering or preventing competition, so long as they do not contain hard-core restrictions such as vertical price fixing.

⁷ An exclusive agreement includes agreements where a customer agrees to purchase all, or a substantial part generally, 80% or more) of its total requirements of a given good or service from a single seller. It also includes agreements where a manufacturer agrees to provide a good or service through a single re-seller in Jersey.

Such an analysis requires us to define relevant markets and assess the levels of concentration in these markets. For more information, see Guideline 7 – Market Definition.

Restrictions on Inter-Brand competition are usually more potentially problematic then those on Intra-Brand competition

A general goal competition law is to provide consumers with a choice of the goods or services on offer. Thus, for example, vertical agreements that restrict the distribution of a particular brand of a product may not hinder or prevent competition if there are many competing brands for that product.

Generally, a manufacturer should not require a re-seller to purchase additional products or services from it as a condition for the re-seller purchasing the desired product or service from the manufacturer

For example, a re-seller wanting to sell a particular manufacturer's photocopiers should not be required to also purchase paper from the manufacturer as a condition for purchasing the photocopiers.

Generally, a manufacturer cannot force a re-seller to purchase the given good or service that is subject to a supply agreement solely from the manufacturer, even if the agreement is exclusive

The re-seller should remain free to purchase the good or service in question from other sources, such as wholesalers or other resellers.

Non-compete agreements after the expiration of a supply contract

Non-compete agreements must be necessary to protect commercially sensitive information transferred from the manufacturer to the re-seller. They must also be limited in scope and duration⁹.

Communications between re-seller and supplier under a supply agreement

In general, a re-seller is allowed to help a manufacturer protect and enforce its intellectual property rights by reporting potential infringement of such rights to the manufacturer. A manufacturer is also generally allowed to gain market intelligence through its re-sellers. However, concerns may arise in this area if several competing manufacturers contract with the same re-seller. In this scenario, the re-seller may need to have adequate internal safeguards in place to ensure that commercially sensitive information about one manufacturer is not passed to other manufacturers.

⁹ For more discussion on the analysis of ancillary restraints such as non-compete covenants, see JCRA Decision M072/06, Neville Keith Moore, Glenda Faith Moore-Wilson & Island Estates LLP/A de Gruchy Co. & Ltd, paragraphs 14-16 (8 November 2006).

6. Exemptions and Guidance

There are circumstances under which a vertical agreement in Jersey may qualify for an exemption from the prohibitions on preventing or hindering competition set out in the laws. However, a vertical agreement that hinders or prevents competition is prohibited by the laws unless it qualifies for an exemption. Applications for individual exemptions must be made to the Authority. To grant such an exemption, we must be satisfied under the laws that the agreement:

- (a) is likely to improve the production or distribution of goods or services, or to promote technical or economic progress in the production or distribution of goods or services;
- (b) will allow consumers of those goods or services a fair share of any resulting benefit;
- (c) does not impose on the businesses concerned terms that are not indispensable to attainment of the objectives mentioned in (a) and (b); and
- (d) does not afford the businesses concerned the ability to eliminate competition in respect of a substantial part of the goods or services in question.

For more information, see Guideline 1 – Anti-Competitive Agreements and Guideline 6 – Applications for Guidance and Exemptions.

It is important to note that the Vertical Agreements Block Exemption Regulation (BER)¹⁰ that is applicable within the European Union does not apply in Jersey. Like other EU precedents, the BER is a source that we may use to inform our analysis of individual exemption applications in Jersey.

7. Potential consequences of an infringement

The consequences for ignoring the laws' application to vertical agreements are potentially severe. An agreement that prevents or hinders competition and is not otherwise subject to an exemption is void as a matter of law. This concept of voidness applies not only to the agreement in question, but to all other agreements 'tainted' by the anti-competitive agreement. In a vertical context, this potentially means that not only would a reseller's contract with a manufacturer be void and unenforceable if it is found to infringe the competition law, but the re-seller's contracts with its own customers for the goods or services in question also could be void and unenforceable.

If the Authority decides that an agreement infringes the laws, it may issue directions that it deems appropriate to the parties to bring the infringement to an end. It may also impose financial penalties, limited to 10% of the turnover of the business during the infringement, up to a maximum period of 3 years. Our decisions in this regard are subject to appeal by the parties to the Island's Royal Court.

¹⁰ Commission Regulation (EU) No 330/2010

Under the laws, third parties that have been harmed as a result of infringements of the laws may bring their own action for damages, including punitive damages, in the Royal Court.

8. Abuse of dominance in a vertical context

This guideline has focussed on applicability of the Channel Islands' competition laws to common vertical agreements between businesses. It should be noted, however, that the laws' prohibition on abuses of dominance may also be applicable to certain forms of conduct in relation to vertical agreements. For example, a business that supplies a critical input to downstream markets may abuse a dominant position by refusing to supply the input, or offering to supply it only on discriminatory or excessive terms. Furthermore, an abuse of dominance may arise if a business that controls an essential facility denies access to that facility to others. The business in question must hold a dominant position in the market or markets in question.

For more information, see Guideline 5 – Abuse of a Dominant Position.
